U.S. Marines helping with the relief effort in Japan will be using technology developed by a New Hampshire company.

Global Relief Technologies in Portsmouth says the Marines will begin using the company's Rapid Data Management System in the next few days to help analyze infrastructure and assist with clean-up and rebuilding efforts after Friday's massive earthquake and tsunami.

Last year, the company sent a team to Haiti to use satellite-linked handheld computers to take a census of amputees after the devastating earthquake there.

The military recently had a training mission to teach Marines how to use the technology.
